Chapter 1 by Lynielle

Breathless.

That's all she is after her shift ended, running over here and over there, her unruly light brown hair whipping here and there. She tried pulling her hood over but her stubborn hair just won't calm down.

They were running for hours, she and her brother Cad along with some Rebels looking for any resources to bring back to their headquarters; bread, water, meat, anything that could keep the remaining Rebels alive for a few more weeks.

You see, searching for those necessities isn't a piece of cake. Well, in this desert like environment with harsh wind and sand splashing your face every few moments would definitely make the task harder than it already is.

"Luck isn't with us today, huh?" she asked her brother even though the answer is obvious. She need to look up in order to see him properly, for his age -- 17 he's considered taller than average. He's the tallest even among those who are older than him.

At the age of 19, she have already witnessed probably a hundred or more uprising by different "sectors" and all of them doesn't end in celebration and wine it's most likely filled with swords and blood.

Not only do they have to gather food, they need to train as well along with crafting weapons. As a member of the Rebels, one can say that they need to expect the unexpected as Officials are on the hunt for any little bit of possible mutiny against the Higher Ones.

They could end up the same way the older Rebels' story ended; decapitated and fed to the wolves.

What are these kids doing you might ask, where are their parents. Well, she and Cad lost their parents at a young age and surprise surprise they were also Rebels --they're one of the many who got decapitated and fed to the wolves. This being the main reason why they joined the Rebels.

They despised the Officials and the Higher Ones for leaving their parents breathless.
